Questions of resilience have become paramount in discourse around urban development over the past few years. There are many unpredictable factors that can adversely affect an urban system in dramatic ways. As architects and urban planners it becomes imperative for us to develop systems, both tangible and non-tangible to be able to address these, so that the impact of such an event be mitigated as best as it can.

The BReUCom Project hopes to be able to develop pedagogical frameworks and courses that can be introduced in colleges of architecture and planning for students as well as professionals interested in questions of resilience through engagement in multidisciplinary conversations.

The symposium aims to engage in these very conversations through lectures on the theme of Resilience, by academicians. The symposium will also act as a platform to discuss case studies by various institutional partners, which become the basis for the development of Courseware and Professional Development Programmes.
